COLLABORATE. CORRELATE. COMMUNICATE

DRN's own CEO – Wayne McLeish Addresses the Students at the Wharton School of Business

Pennsylvania's Wharton School of Business is recognized as world's first collegiate business school established in 1881. Throughout the past one hundred and twenty five years it has produced Nobel prize winners, heads of state, ambassadors and supreme court justices.

As the world's most published business school faculty, one of their greatest strengths is the ability of bridging the gap between theory and practice when teaching its students. Most recently our own Wayne McLeish was asked to participate in a panel discussion entitled "Achieving Agility through Collaborative Software." To quote from the conference organizers "Corporations are using collaborative software to redefine business processes in different ways; from enabling sharing of information to leverage their knowledge, to allowing distributed collaboration across geographically separated locations in real-time". Other participants on the panel were Sun Microsystems and EMC both Fortune 500s companies.
